The poems in Another 100 Haiku are divided into four sections: "Spring," "Summer," "Autumn," and "Winter." Each section captures the unique beauty of a different season. Chandler's haiku are full of vivid imagery and sensory details that bring the natural world to life. In "Spring," for example, Chandler writes:

The first buds of spring Unfurling in the warm breeze A new life begins

In "Summer," Chandler captures the heat and vibrancy of the season:

The sun beats down hot The birds sing in the trees A lazy summer day

In "Autumn," Chandler celebrates the changing colors of the leaves:

The leaves turn golden Falling from the trees Autumn's fiery kiss

And in "Winter," Chandler captures the beauty of the snow-covered landscape:

Snow falls softly down Covering the world in white A winter wonderland

Chandler's haiku are not only beautiful, but they are also thought-provoking. In many of his poems, Chandler explores the relationship between humans and nature. In "The River," for example, Chandler writes:

The river flows on Unmindful of our presence A timeless witness

In this poem, Chandler reminds us that the natural world is something that we are a part of, but that it is also something that is beyond our control. The river flows on, regardless of what we do. It is a reminder that we are not the only ones who inhabit this planet, and that we must respect the natural world.
