As the group explores Gallia, they encounter a variety of challenges and dangers. They must contend with extreme temperatures, radiation, and the ever-present threat of being thrown off the comet into the void of space.

Despite the challenges, Servadac and his companions manage to establish a thriving community on Gallia. They build shelters, grow food, and even create a rudimentary form of government.

As time passes, Servadac and his companions begin to realize that Gallia is not as isolated as they first thought. They discover that the comet is inhabited by a race of intelligent beings called the Galleans.

The Galleans are a peaceful and technologically advanced people. They welcome Servadac and his companions to their world and teach them about their culture and history.

Servadac and the Galleans form a close alliance. Together, they work to build a better future for both of their peoples.

In the end, Servadac and his companions decide to remain on Gallia. They have found a new home and a new purpose in life.
